Student Success Predicting Success for Online Students	Joe Montgomery <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • In December 2012, the WACTC Strategic Visioning Committee (SVC) requested that the Research and Planning Commission (RPC) undertake a study of the performance of students in face-to-face (F2F), online, hybrid, and web-enhanced courses across the state. A data set was constructed using the new MRTE+ database, including courses in which there were an adequate number of students in each of the four types of classes. • The findings from the initial two months of the study included the following points: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Roughly 20% of the total represented enrollment in online classes; about 70% were F2F or web-enhanced; the remainder (just under 10%) were hybrid. • Mean course grades were the highest in F2F classes, followed by web-enhanced, hybrid, and online classes. Withdrawal and failure rates were the highest for online classes and lowest for F2F. • Across all four types of classes, grades were, on average, higher for Whites than Hispanics, and higher for students of higher SES levels.

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Findings from the literature review were very consistent with the research findings. <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ Students generally see online classes as being more difficult than the same class in F2F format. ○ Interaction with students was found to be the best single predictor of student success. ○ The assumptions of students taking online courses (e.g., faculty will be well-organized, respond promptly to questions) are often quite different from faculty assumptions (e.g., students will be self-motivated and well-organized) leading to dissatisfaction with online courses by both groups. ○ Several "Best Practices" in online pedagogy were identified, including video capture of lectures, video chats and synchronous learning opportunities, and rapid response by instructors to student questions. • Several recommendations were identified from the literature that might help improve online course effectiveness: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Treat taking online courses as a privilege, not a right; • Screen students for those likely to succeed in online courses; offer "readiness educational activities" for students who are not initially prepared to succeed; • Set up "early warning" systems to identify students who are not succeeding in online courses; • Create a system to monitor the quality of online courses, including the use of appropriate online pedagogy and technology; • Provide professional development activities to assist faculty in developing and teaching online courses. • Additional analyses were performed for the May SVC meeting, focusing on Developmental Math and English (with course numbers in the 90s) and on identifying predictors of student success in online courses. • Overall, this final phase of the research study showed that online classes are even less common at the pre-college level than at the college level, and that online classes, especially English, are difficult for Developmental students. The predictive study, involving college-level courses, found that cumulative GPA-- that is, prior academic performance-- was a very strong predictor of online grades. Consequently, setting a minimum GPA requirement for taking online classes may be an effective way to help improve student success.
Reports Competency Based Degrees	President Cummins National Trends <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Strong enrollment response to new providers on online competency-based degrees offered by public and private non-profit colleges and universities. • Recent U.S. Department of Education "Dear Colleague" letter requesting the use of federal financial aid for competency-based courses to further the desire to award aid based on "content learned" rather than "time served." • The expansion of eLearning nationally creates a competitive risk to our current market of 120,000 eLearning students, or 32,000 FTES, which constitute 20 percent of enrollments in our colleges. College System Assets Washington's college system has a number of strengths that will support implementation of competency-based courses and degrees across the state.

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Washington’s 34 community and technical colleges share a common information technology infrastructure for student demographic data; transcripts and financial aid; course data; subject disciplines and enrollments; personnel data and employment categories; and financial expenditures and revenues. Conceptual Framework Washington’s community and technical college system wants to test the concept of competency-based degrees. System-wide “proof of concept” effort: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> All colleges will have the opportunity to participate in offering competency-based courses and degrees to their students through a consortium of member colleges. Students: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Eligible students must demonstrate readiness to succeed in college level, online courses and complete an orientation course prior to starting the program. Curriculum: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> All the competency-based courses will be online, asynchronous, and available through pooled enrollments. Open resources will be used in the formal course design. (Campus and online library resources will also be available to students for course research assignments and general information.) Finance: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Member colleges will share the design costs of the initial degree program and courses as well as the operating costs of the consortium. Member colleges will enroll and transcript students in the competency-based degree programs and report enrollments for state support. Trustee Jackson asked if there would be accreditation? President Cummins replied yes.
